
list of nfl teams browns: What's next

Posted by Robert F Marsh - 2010/02/22 15:18

When I look at Chris Palmer, I see more computer geek (not that there's anything wrong with that) than NFL head coach. Today's news conference reminded me of the many internet startups we've seen lately. Given that, let me play Walt-wanna-be and facetiously look at the next few months in Browns town. 1/21/99 Browns announce the startup of web site Palmer.com to coincide with the signing of Chris Palmer as their new head coach. Initially the site will provide free e-mail to anyone wanting to spam Art Modell. 1/22/99 Palmer.com adds e-commerce to its site to sell NFL licensed items, although nothing is available for the Baltimore Ravens. 1/29/99 Palmer.com adds a chat feature where football fans can discuss such subjects as When will Carmen Policy's hair turn completely white , Should Dwight Clark take lithium , Who has the cutest butt in the NFL , and Is Keyshawn Johnson the best damn football player ever . 2/9/99 Browns claim Antonio Langham, Andy Heck, a web presence developer, an e-commerce director, and two java programmers in the expansion draft. Strangely, the last four consume almost the entire salary cap. 2/12/99 Billionaire Al Lerner signs every one of the NFL unrestricted free agents and announces new internet auction site snapthemup.com. NFL teams can simply sign on to the site and bid for free agents. 2/13/99 NFL teams complain about sham bids on snapthemup.com. 2/14/99 NFL teams complain that some of the merchandise from snapthemup.com is of lower quality than described. 4/16/99 Browns obtain domain name snaptocouch.com prior to the NFL draft. Just in case things don't work out, they also obtain snaptomcnown.com, snaptomcnabb.com, and handofftoWilliams.com. 7/1/99 Browns sign Marc Andressen from Netscape to play tight end and Chief Technical Officer. Palmer proclaims Andressen as the first slash in http:// . 1/12/00 After their first season, Browns set NFL records for click throughs, page views, and wins by an expansion team. Seriously, I like this geeky guy. Kind of reminds me of Blanton Collier with good hearing. He took a jab at Trivisanno in his first news conference so he can't be that bad. GO BROWNS! Bubba in Milwaukee

=====